The Eucharistic Sacrifice in Orthodox Theology: 12th century discussions

During the middle of the 12th century, there were vigorous debates in Constantinople concerning the nature of the eucharistic sacrifice. Is the eucharist a true sacrifice and, if so, what is its relation to the sacrifice of Christ on the cross? Particular account will be taken in this lecture of councils of Constantinople of 1146 and 1147.

The change of gear from high Gothic art through Bosch, Bruegel, and beyond, is often seen as an indication of developing humanist tendencies in Western art and theology, and the abandonment of the central motifs of Christian imagery. We will explore this with examples of subjects across artists (for example the Temptation of St Anthony), with a view to assessing this assumption. Rather than seeing Bruegel as a humanistic step in the West, we will test whether, rather, it may be indicative of embeddedness of God in obscurity, and a quest to discern the incarnation's deepest significance.
